Subject: Scientists charged up by wells' latent power

Austin American-Statesman (Texas)

Scientists charged up by wells' latent power;

Researchers say hot water that's now oil field waste could be turning turbines

Ben Wear, AMERICAN-STATESMAN STAFF

It's the bane of the oil field: water.

Companies spend millions drilling a well, and down-hole surveys show it will yield only water. Or their old, formerly robust oil and gas wells give way over the years to nothing but water.

All a producer can do in such circumstances is call out the concrete trucks and plug the well.

But two Texas academic researchers say these dry holes and wet holes could be an alternative energy gusher waiting to be tapped, particularly in a "hot zone" in eastern and coastal Texas that extends into Louisiana and Arkansas.

The heat from that worthless, troublesome salt water, they say, could be turned into electricity, a whole lot of electricity.

"I know there's huge potential along the Gulf Coast," said Richard Erdlac, a research scientist at the University of Texas of the Permian Basin. "I see a lot of potential for companies to use that on-site to reduce their expenses. From there it can go to producing electricity for the (statewide) grid. . . . You want to talk about thinking outside the box? Let's really start doing it."

David Blackwell, a Southern Methodist University geophysics professor, co-authored a September article in the Oil and Gas Journal on the potential of oil field water for generating electricity.

Just using water from existing wells in Texas and six other states, Blackwell writes, could generate up to 5,000 mega-watts, or about twice the peak load of Austin Energy.

Put another way, that's like adding three or four nuclear power plants.

But relying only on old wells could vastly understate the potential, Blackwell and Erdlac say.

The several hundred thousand wells drilled in Texas during the past century are an informational gold mine that could point the way to drill for, in effect, electricity.

"There are estimates for the Gulf Coast of up to 100,000 megawatts," Blackwell said.

What Blackwell and Erdlac have in mind is basically an extension of a geothermal subindustry that already exists in California and other Western states that are affected by tectonic activity, such as the shifting of underground plates, which creates heat.

Wells in those regions generally reach superheated basement rocks at 10,000 feet or more below the surface and produce either steam or hot water. The steam or hot water is then used to move turbines, which in turn generate electricity.

In the central United States, where the hottest basement rock is much deeper, the theory is that geothermal power could instead be generated from the sandstone and limestone formations above the basement rock, the strata where oil and gas is generally found.

Blackwell is focusing on existing wells and fields.

Most wells start out making almost no briny water, only hydrocarbons such as oil and gas, because engineers are able to determine where the hydrocarbon-bearing rock formations are and punch holes in the pipe opposite only those areas.

But over time, as oil and gas are removed, water tends to move up from below and begin joining the flow.

Given the expense, much of it to purchase electricity to run pumping units and to dispose of the water, a well making 2 barrels of oil and 200 barrels of water a day becomes a losing proposition and is shut down.

In so-called waterfloods, water is injected into wells to push the remaining oil to other wells. Such fields produce an enormous amount of water and have centralized collection facilities.

Blackwell envisions installing generating units at these central points. A unit that generates 250 kilowatts, enough to supply about 165 homes, would be about bedroom-size and cost about $400,000, he said.

The problem is, most of the state's waterflood operations are in West Texas, where temperatures at the bottom of existing wells are cooler, typically below 200 degrees Fahrenheit.

The hotter area (about 3 to 4 miles down) exists east of Interstate 35, for reasons that even experts such as Blackwell and Erdlac say are not entirely clear.

Erdlac, noting the large swath from Laredo to Texarkana with unusually hot subsurface temperatures, envisions drilling wells from scratch and seeking water on purpose.

This is a tougher proposition, because the truly hot water of 250 degrees F or more needed to generate electricity in volume is at 18,000 feet and below. Such wells can cost $10 million to $20 million to drill, which would take a lot of electricity to justify.

Erdlac says, however, that some oil and gas might be found in the process, helping pay back the investment.

So how does the oil industry view all this?

"They've got their eyes open and ears open," said Prentice Creel, a Halliburton Co. petroleum engineer who serves on the Society of Petroleum Engineers board. "You have a tremendous number of wells that are already in the ground, already producing, and all you have to do is throw something out there to collect the energy."

In the end, such solutions are inevitable, Creel said, given that oil and gas are finite resources on the downhill side of their life cycles.

Earth's heat, meanwhile, is seemingly inexhaustible.

"Can it be done? Yes, it can be done," Creel said. "And it's going to be done eventually because it's going to have to be done, because we have to have electricity."

Legislators Eager for a Say in Spending Louisiana Aid

By ADAM NOSSITER
The New York Times

BATON ROUGE, La., Jan. 13 - With a shower of federal dollars about to rain down on this state, jockeying is beginning here in the halls of the Louisiana Capitol over who will control the money.

In a place where eagerness to grab money is dampened only by its usual scarcity, the prospect of some $9 billion in quick Hurricane Katrina relief - half the state's normal budget - has whetted appetites. Even legislators normally wary of their colleagues' free-spending ways are nervous about being shut out.

On Friday, as Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco's handpicked, 26-member recovery commission, the Louisiana Recovery Authority, made first plans for dividing up the money, a handful of state legislators hung around outside a committee room here. Some predicted fights over what they see as Ms. Blanco's propensity for hoarding the largesse.

The commitments Friday - $100 million in small-business loans, $141 million to repair state buildings and $100 million for infrastructure - were the first steps in reconstruction spending, which has lagged that in Mississippi, where officials had plans for that state's money weeks ago. Mississippi is giving outright grants of up to $150,000 to homeowners who did not have flood insurance.

The picture here is complicated by competing political interests, uncertain authority and far greater storm damage. Prospects for additional help - specifically, hoped-for federal reconstruction legislation many officials here see as a giant cure-all - appeared cloudier on Friday.

As he has previously done, Donald Powell, President Bush's Gulf Coast recovery chief, refused to commit himself to the legislation, in an appearance before the recovery authority. Sponsored by Representative Richard H. Baker, Republican of Louisiana, the bill would pay off owners of ruined homes and lending companies holding worthless mortgages. The recovery authority's executive director, Andy Kopplin, called the bill "fundamental."

But the most Mr. Powell would say, when a commission member brought it up, was, "We share a common goal." Later, Mr. Baker called the bill's prospects "very good."

Meanwhile, attention was focused on the $9 billion Louisiana is certain to get. The governor was careful to call the Legislature a "partner" in doling it out. But outside the room, skeptical lawmakers were predicting a fight in a special session next month, with an energized Legislature seeking to rein in Ms. Blanco's recovery panel, which is made up of prominent Louisianians from many walks of life.

"We've been good-government-grouped to death," said State Representative Cedric Richmond, a New Orleans Democrat who is chairman of the Legislative Black Caucus.

Dismissing the idea that the recovery authority might be best trusted to handle such a large sum, Mr. Richmond said: "I think the Legislature is a great place. If it's coming through the state, I think the local representatives should have a lot of input." The governor's "past actions have not been inclusive at all," Mr. Richmond added.

In normal times, legislators in this poor state eagerly compete to build community halls, recreation centers or other amenities for their needy constituents. The final days of legislative sessions can be frantic with such maneuvering. Now, though, the stakes are far higher.

The money consists of some $6 billion that state officials say they will get in Community Development Block Grants from the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and another $3 billion to rebuild properties to better withstand catastrophic hurricanes.

"I do have some concerns that if we flow it out to the Legislature, it's going to turn into the usual feeding frenzy," said State Senator John T. Schedler, a Republican from the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain.

Still, Mr. Schedler added, "I think there ought to be some mechanism for us to have some voice."

Constitutional experts in the body insist that the Legislature alone can appropriate money.

"Being a businessman, I'm into accountability," said State Senator Walter J. Boasso, a Republican from St. Bernard Parish, the area hit hardest by the storm. Recovery authority members "don't have to answer to the public," Mr. Boasso said.

Authority officials insist there will be "consensus," as Mr. Kopplin put it: spending ideas will go to a joint legislative committee, which has to "bless them," he said. That panel is stacked with the governor's allies, her critics say. What is more, the spending proposals are then passed on to HUD by Ms. Blanco, and as for the money itself, "Congress gave it to the governor," Mr. Kopplin said.

One member of the recovery authority, Sean Reilly, recently described the body this way: "Its real teeth is in its oversight of the money."

Such talk seems certain to set up conflicts with the often pugnacious Legislature when it returns next month.

"I do not think the Legislature will sit idly by and allow the governor to distribute whatever federal dollars are received for the purpose of rebuilding the state," said State Senator John L. Dardenne, Republican of Baton Rouge.

"You do have a political dichotomy at work," Mr. Dardenne said. "We want decisions made by people who can be held accountable to the public. The public doesn't elect the Louisiana Recovery Authority."

Subject: November 10th Invitation from the Marine Corps

The Chief just got a call from Fred Smith (FedEx) encouraging the President to accept the invitation to attend the dedication of the Marine Corps Museum at Quantico. He said that an invitation had already been sent from General Hagee. Smith serves on the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation.

Friday, November 10th (which we believe is the day that Veterans Day will be observed)
30,000+ people

He would like for the Chief to let him know if we're going to decline it, b/c he will want to call the President about it.

Thanks!

SW
Dear Mr. President:

The United States Marine Corps is pleased to dedicate its new National Museum of the Marine Corps on November 10, 2006, at the Marine Corps Heritage Center in Quantico, VA. It would be my great privilege to have you as our guest of honor at the dedication ceremony, which will coincide with the Birthday of the U.S. Marine Corps.

The Marine Corps cherishes our history and values our unique contributions to this great nation. The Museum will tell the story of America "through the eyes of Marines." It will be a place for all Americans, Marines and civilian alike, to experience the true essence of the Corps and our nation's history. This new national venue of history, pride and heritage is the result of a unique partnership between the United States Marine Corps and the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation.

We anticipate 30,000 guests including active-duty Marines, veterans, members of Congress, family members and other proud Americans. We look forward to discussing this event with your staff. Our point of contact is Mr. John Haukedahl at 703 614-1872.

On behalf of Marines worldwide I thank you for your consideration and hope your schedule will permit you to join us on this great occasion.

Very respectfully,

M. W. HAGEE
General, U. S. Marine Corps
Commandant of the Marine Corps

The President
The White House
